K. Neeta brings in many special memories from childhood and the things we learned from our grandmothers and mothers - the art of canning and preserving fresh vegetables from the garden to keep in the cellar for tasty and wholesome goodness year round. She shows her knowledge of history in the first paragraph: `Canning food has become a vastly popular method of preserving goods and making goods last longer. Around the early 1800s, canning was first developed by a French man named Nicholas Appert when the French militant government offered a cash prize of 12,000 francs to the first person to present a suitable method for an invention that would aid in the long-term preservation of food. With his ingenious method of storage, Appert discovered a way to perfectly can foods, allowing them to last for up to thirty years without being spoiled by the proliferation of microorganisms. Little did Appert probably know that his new invention would change the face of history as we know it. In order to accurately can any type of edible goods, you must first use some form of heat to seal the container such as vacuum treatment, boiling, pasteurization, refrigeration, drying, freezing, or a wide combination of these different methods.' After her introduction she cautions us to abide by USDA Guidelines for canning and a discussion of preservatives - listing all the natural preservatives as spices, oil, salt, acids (lemon, vinegar), antioxidants (citric acid), and sugar - she tackles the different forms of canning: Water Bath Canning, Pressure Canning, and the * Differences Between A Dial-Gauge Pressure, A Weighted-Gauge Canner and Dual-Gauge Pressure Canner!
